In 1996, a U.Va. Engineering professor designed computer modules to conduct "virtual" experiments in the classroom, allowing students to alter experimental parameters with just a few keystrokes.